

Question marks

All questions need question marks. Questions often include the words what, where, why, when and how, but sometimes just depend on the way the words are spoken. Simply raising the voice at the end of a sentence can turn the sentence into a question. Add one question mark to each of the sentence groups below.

Questions, questions

- Mr Side: Well done, Jade. Now then, where would I find the capital of Japan.?
- Darren: Please, Sir, can I answer, Sir.
- Mr Side: Certainly, Darren. What is the answer.
- Darren: Please, Sir, would you find the capital of Japan in Japan, Sir.
- Mr Side: Are you playing the fool, Darren.
- Darren: No, Sir. Of course not, Sir. I mean, you wouldn't find the capital of Japan in America or Russia, would you, Sir.
- Mr Side: Are you all right, Darren. You're normally quite a sensible boy.
- Darren: I'm fine, Sir. Japan's an interesting country, isn't it, Sir.
- Mr Side: It certainly is. Like Britain, Japan is a series of islands. Its capital is Tokyo. Does anybody know where I'd find Tokyo on the map.
- Darren: Please, Sir. I know. Would it be on one of the islands, Sir.
- Mr Side: Darren, I am becoming very, very cross. Are you sure you're not playing the fool.
- Darren: No, Sir. I mean, the capital of Japan wouldn't be in the sea, would it.
- Mr Side: That's it! I've had enough! Any more nonsense and I will send you to the Head. Do you understand.
- Darren: Yes, Sir. Please, Sir.
- Mr Side: Enough! No more questions. Is that clear.
- Darren: Yes, Sir. Sorry, Mr Side. Can I just ask...
